Two Key Decisions for China's Sovereign Fund

Caseism.com
China

- China is a sovereign state with a utilitarian government.

Taiwan

Caseism.com

- Taiwan is officially recognized as a state by the United Nations, however China believes Taiwan is a state of China. Taiwan can be considered sovereign by the international community, but the average Chinese citizen believes they are not as such.
Origins

Caseism.com

- This conflict ultimately arose from the communist revolution and corresponding civil war that occurred in China during the late 1940's. The civil war in the state was between communists supporters and nationalists. In 1971 the United Nations officially changed China's seat from nationalist to communist
Defeat of Nationalists

- After their defeat in 1949 nationalists leaders fled to Taiwan for fear of communist persecution. These nationalists leaders still held themselves as the rulers of China, however they were not as they believed. Even if these leaders no longer ruled China, they were pleased to rule the small island of Taiwan.
Taiwan's declaration as a sovereign state

- In 1999 the president/leader/ emperor/nationalist of Taiwan declared the state and independent nation, not bound to China.

How culture has affected the issue

Caseism.com

- There is no strong cultural difference between the states of China and Taiwan, due to the fact that the state of China was founded by the Chinese. Both places speak the same language, carry out similar cultural values, etc. The difference in the two nations, however, lies in the type of governments of the nations. China has a socialist government, and Taiwan has a capitalist one.
Global Recognition of Taiwan

- There is a global issue on whether or not Taiwan is actually a considerable part of China, or its own nation. It states it is sovereign, and many countries regard it as such, but China still claims it as its own.
